Just before the 2nd Battle of Polotsk, the Russians were 39,000 infantry (including 10,000 opolochenie), 5,900 cavalry & 172 guns.

The operations diary of the Russian I Corps gives its forces on October 29th (without the detachment of Vlastov & the garrison of Polotsk): 27,000 infantry (including 7,000 opolochenie), a little more than 4,000 cavalry & 121 guns.

If we see the force of the same regiments that Wittgenstein command directly on October 29th (so, without Vlastov & garrison of Polotsk), but on October 16th, we find: about 33,000 infantry (including 8,000 opolochenie); 5,300 cavalry & 132 guns. Thus, between October 16th and 29th, these troops have suffered 6,000 losses of infantry.
including 1,000 opolochenie; 1,200 of cavalry & 11 guns. In percentage, infantry (without opolochenie) suffered 20%; opolochenie, 12% & cavalry, 20% too. I use these percentages to estimate the forces of each Russian unit on October 29th, knowing the imperfection of such a calculation, the losses being not proportionally distributed between the units.
